Ever since the Blue Dasher was a little egg floating in the Bellevue Pond it dreamed of becoming Delaware's state dragonfly, and I'm here to show you why this dragonfly's dream should come true. First, the Blue Dasher is very territorial and Delaware is very protective of its small state. I know this because the University of Wisconsin Saukville field station states in an article "Male Blue dashers are pretty territorial." Second, the Blue Dasher is a very strong flyer. You know who else is a strong flyer? The pilots at the Dover Air Force Base. I know that this dragonfly is a strong flyer because the Scholastic book Insects Up Close Dragonflies states "Dragonflies are powerful fliers." The last reason the Blue Dasher should be Delaware's state dragonfly is because the people of Delaware care a lot about the climate and the Blue Dasher is used to track climate change. I know this because The Canadian Field-Naturalist magazine talks about how the Blue Dasher is expanding into North Canada which is a sign that the area's climate is warming up. These are the three reasons why the Blue Dasher should become Delaware's state dragonfly.
